The 2016 Antipode AAG Lecture

What Now?

Michael Watts, University of California, Berkeley

Since the mid-1970s Michael Watts has been central to so many of the conversations that have made radical/critical geography what it is today. Marxist agrarian studies; famine; colonial transitions and postcolonial capitalisms; the political economy of development; political ecology; food systems; contract farming; oil and petropolitics; the critique of the "resource curse"; state and corporate power; capitalism and modernity; Africa and the consequences of structural adjustment; development at the turn of the millennium; Islam and social struggle; war and spectacle; the legacies of 1968 and other utopias...the list of keywords goes on and on.

To mark Michael Watts' 2016 Antipode AAG lecture, in this virtual issue of Antipode, we follow a red thread running through all this, pulling together a number of recent papers from our archives as a primer and/or further reading to the lecture.
